2007, 2008, and 2009, the researchers used a survey to measure the prevalence of physical activity in 11,460 health-care workers in a large U.S. military medical center. The researchers found that 40% of health-care workers reported doing any physical activity in the last 12 months, and 16% reported doing moderate-to-vigorous physical activity. The researchers also found that health-care workers who reported doing any physical activity in the last 12 months were more likely to report being in good health, having a higher level of education, and being employed in a health-care setting. involved with the development of the condition. Whether or not these factors are the cause of the condition, or merely associated with it, remains to be seen. However, among the other risk factors, possibly related to the condition, are poor oral hygiene, possibly weak and/or loose teeth, and possibly a diet high in refined carbohydrates and possibly lacking in vitamins, especially with vitamins C and D. In addition, the condition is commonly associated with diabetes mellitus. Dependent on the history taken, the patient may be advised to improve oral hygiene, possibly by brushing and flossing, to eat a diet high in vitamins, especially vitamins C and D, and to possibly avoid refined carbohydrates and possibly loose teeth. The condition is usually self-limiting and may resolve itself within a few days. However, if the condition persists, the patient should be referred to a dentist for further evaluation and treatment. The condition is not life-threatening and is not a sign of a more serious condition. However, if the condition is associated with diabetes mellitus, the patient should be advised to control their diabetes. The condition is not contagious and is not a sign of a more serious condition.
